Some shortages stem from bad weather, droughts, earthquakes, or tidal waves.

In energy, the maintenance of low supply levels has been an equally central-although less widely known-aspect of corporate policy. In the United States, as reported "the hot oil act, passed in the 1930s, first formally allowed the oil industry to set its own rate of production through creation of state 'conservation' agencies." Under this legislation prices were kept at artificial levels by firm ceilings on domestic production. Later, as large amounts of oil became available in the Middle East, oil import quotas were set up to protect the American market from the threat of abundance. These were enforced by the cooperative relationships among the seven major Western companies: Exxon, Gulf, Texaco, Mobil, Socon, British Petroleum, and Shell. In an historical analyses, these companies have traditionally kept production down and prices up through price-fixing agreements, interlocking directorates, and banking ties. The success of this Western cartel has led to its being referred to in the industry as the "Seven Sisters."

NOSTREDAME: The corporations are larger than city and county governments. They need the King leader that might pass through the university. The rules are that they do not act subversive to the State. They are following these rules as described in the University in France at the time of Marquis Fontanes.

ANDREA SELESTOW: Some companies are very necessary in the Atom to act in great power. They cannot be cut down in size but that they are still strong through the years in the mission as so established by its founder.

Nancy of Oregon: From the Seven Sisters example, the corporation itself must be kept strong to have a strong nation.

NOSTREDAME: Size of an organization is not so much an indication of monopoly as its raison d'être in the Atom.

Bill Gates: The leader of a US major corporation is not then a fascist leader who is speculating on his Wall Street stock to be building the power he needs to run the company—whether among the judges, the military system or legislatures. Rather, he seeks to continue his mission.

NOSTREDAME: He is one who has the expansion and spinning of the Threefold Flame.

The normal school at Paris was provided for by the decree of 1808, which stated that the boarding school would train three hundred students a year. The pupils, state-supported, had to agree to serve the state for ten years after graduation.

NOSTREDAME: Monopoly here refers to the university in France. The monopoly-university would be to find those who would become the leader or king who is either the reincarnation of the leader or one who understands that mission of the corporation.

MOSES: In returning in reincarnation, then, it is possible for that leader or founder to continue his work.

The king of a company holds an office. He is king or queen. This office must be filled by someone who is schooled at the catholic-universal-religion standard. He would be identified for his understanding and language of the set mission of the company that he had left.

Marquis Fontanes: They would go through the monopoly university, they would serve the corporation for a minimum of ten or more years.

MOTHER MARY: The reincarnation of that leader can be ascertained in much the same way that the lamas look for the last incarnation of a lama or rinpoche or dalai lama.

MOSES: Here we see the family being asked about the child's upbringing and if he is willing to go through the necessary discipline to reach the goal as leader.

MOTHER MARY: Here we see that matching of photographs, the matching of a leader's signatures. His attitudes.

MOSES: Not all are to be considered for a particular industry. In computers this field is primarily of males for example to find the reincarnation of the leader.

MOTHER MARY: This is not meant to be an exact match, only for illustrative purposes. However there would be a testing to see what are the language and coordinates that the child would remember of a prior life.

MOSES: The child would choose to go to the monopoly university for the training and go through the discipline required to fill the office of King, Queen or one of the company's leadership position.
